The glands are tiny, saccular organs, situated in the dermis and occurring all over the skin surface with the exception of the soles of the feet and palms of the hands. They are most abundant in the scalp and face, and apt to be large about the nose and mouth. Each gland consists of a duct terminating in cluster of small secreting pouches and made up of cells containing fat. These cells sometimes break down, leaving a cavity containing debris and mass of fatty substance, and this pent-up secretion enlarges the gland and cause inflammation.

Necessity of Sweat Gland Action.

Under ordinary circumstances the perspiration thrown off is evaporated from the surface of the body without our being sensible of it, and it is called insensible perspiration, but when more sweat exudes from the skin than can be removed at once by evaporation, as under the inguence of heat or great exertion, it is termed sensible perspiration. One of the pleasant results of exercise is the increased perspiration that results; if followed by a bath it seems to lighten and purify the body.

Surface blood vessels to dilate and more blood is sent to the surface to be cooled. In extreme changes of temperature clothing is of course an asset in preserving the normal, healthful body heat.

temperature rises but little. This is explained by the following fact; when the circulation is increased by muscular exertion, the blood vessels dilate, causing the sweat glands to pour out an abundant secretion and this evaporation cools the blood, thus maintaining the average temperature of the beds.

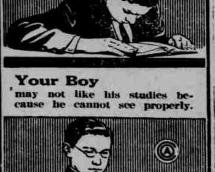

Certain kinds of poisons, and especially alcohol, are literally sweated out of the system by means of hot baths. Bathing and friction are necessary to keep these glands in good working order.

We are hardly sensible of the amount of water discharged from the body in this way, amounting in healthy, normal conditions to about a quart a day. The skin is avarious of moisture; to keep it in good order, it should be suched daily and water drank freely.
